Reviewer comments: "This article is excellent and should be accepted as is and published as soon as possible. As an account of courses using reflective writing in medical education, it is informative, helpful, and inspiring... Even more important, however, the theoretical model its authors have set up provides a powerful and much-needed explanation and justification for incorporating this kind of humanities work into the medical school curriculum, as well as a significant framework for further research evaluating the effectiveness of such interventions. I predict that this article will be widely used and widely cited..."

Empathy for the other and the phenomenology of illness is one of these relevant topics. Professor Shapiro stresses an important point in dealing with emotions provoked by films. She emphasizes that education using film must not stop with the evocation of learners' emotion but further guide learners through discussion with their peers and role models." Blasco PG. (Annotated in the NYU Literature, Arts, and Medicine Database)
 With poetry as its entry and means, this book is a unique addition to medical education literature. It is not an anthology of work intended for use in classes, nor does it provide training on how to implement or teach writing initiatives. Rather, the individual voices of the students whose work it collects, and the attentive ear of their reader and our author, remind those in medical education that while the challenges of acculturation or knowledge accumulation may be familiar, in the refusal to normalize them, we must continue to seek ways to listen to students. - Margaret LeMay-Lewis, MFA(University of Iowa Carver College of Medicine) Doody Reviews 6/06/2010
